Models to Enhance Regional Integration and Employment in the Mediterranean

The Euro-Mediterranean region brings together a diverse set of countries with different cultural backgrounds and economic, social and political realities, which are each developing at a varying pace and with variable geometry. In line with the complex dynamics of intertwined integration and disintegration characterising the region, Ayadi and Sessa 1 (2013) devised a number of alternative scenarios that could play out in Euro-Mediterranean relations by 'Horizon 2030', two of which were particularly interesting. In the worse-case scenario, labelled "red transition", the Mediterranean Sea becomes a dividing line between diverse but conflicting civilisations, leading to deeper political uncertainties and mounting economic and social difficulties, as tensions escalate between, but also within, the two shores, linked by the effects of contagion in the context of a number of issues, yet without being able to resort to cooperation. In the best-case scenario, labelled "blue transition", the Euro-Mediterranean region experiences an increasing heterogeneity where the active contribution of people, civil society and policymakers, as well as synergetic policies are built on existing areas of agreement between distinct yet related countries.

The latest developments on both shores of the Mediterranean Sea indicate that the region has been moving in the direction of the red transition. To the north, the European Union is grappling with a timid recovery from the economic crisis, with a dangerous imbalance between northern and southern European countries and the failure to find a satisfactory common response to the ongoing migration crisis. The related upsurge of nationalist sentiments, often disguised among populist claims and Brexit, has possibly turned the threat of fragmentation of the European Union from an adventurous speculation into a plausible scenario. To the south, Arab countries have witnessed disruptive social and political transformations, with both the democratic aspirations of large segments of the population and the rise of extremism in a small, yet growing minority erupting in a series of upheavals, destabilising the region's polities, economies and societies. These dynamics led to the exacerbation of tensions in several areas of the Mediterranean Basin, such as in Syria and Libya, where civil uprisings evolved into international theatres of war and different factions pursue their contradictory agendas with little regard for human and social consequences. In light of such developments, it is difficult to argue that Euro-Mediterranean relations delivered on the promise of achieving shared prosperity through enhanced political association and economic integration. In the decades leading to the 2011 Arab uprisings, Euro-Mediterranean policymakers seemingly equated stagnation with stability, choosing to side-line human rights and, more broadly, much needed political reforms, while issues such as combatting terrorism and controlling borders dominated the agenda. On the economic front, trade negotiations led to a substantial waiving of tariffs but failed to create the conditions or the emergence of regional value chains and sustainable jobs for the educated, notwithstanding the undoubted similarities between structural characteristics that could have been exploited by economies on both shores of the Mediterranean Sea.

Against this background, the objectives of the EMNES Annual Conference 2019 are twofold:

Objective 1

At the EMNES Policy Conference on the 27 June 2019 the objective is to discuss the EMNES Blue Transition Scenario 2050 and the Comprehensive Policy Roadmap towards new models of regional integration, new models for socio-economic development with a special focus on employment creation in the Mediterranean. The new policies and models developed under this research phase will guide the research agenda of EMNES in the coming years;

Objective 2

At the EMNES Scientific Conference on the 28 June 2019 the objective is to discuss and disseminate the results and conclusions of the work accomplished under EMNES policy research.

The EMNES Annual Conference 2019 includes EMNES Researchers, Associate Committee and Advisory Committee members, international economists and policy experts.

The Euro-Mediterranean Network of Economic Studies (EMNES) new socio-economic vision stems from the quest for long-term economic policy solutions aiming at more inclusive, sustainable and employment driven socio-economic development in the region.

EMNES research covers the following areas

- The role of institutions and labour markets;
- The role of the private sector and Micro, Small and Medium-Sized Enterprises in achieving an inclusive development model;
- Social business and social inclusion;
- Entrepreneurship and innovation;
- Finance, employment and inclusive growth;
- Human capital, skill mismatches, job creation and migration;
- Macroeconomic policies, business productivity and job creation;
- Economics of the Euro-Mediterranean partnership;
